“Dr. Theodore B. Sachs:
Chicago’s Champion Fighter
Against Tuberculosis”

In the early 1900s, when tuberculosis was widespread in the poor Jewish immigrant community, Dr. Sachs treated patients at the West Side Dispensary (later the Mandel Clinic) at Maxwell and Morgan streets, a free health clinic. Supported by Jewish charitable organizations, Dr. Sachs led a tireless 15-year movement that culminated in the establishment of a 650-bed public health institution devoted to TB treatment and research, the Chicago Municipal Tuberculosis Sanitarium.

Frances Archer has researched the history of the institution extensively, and she conducts walking tours of its former grounds, now known as North Park Village. Archer’s previous presentation for the CJHS was “Von Steuben High School: The Jewish Glory Days.” She writes the popular blog “Me & My Shadow: A Life in Chicago.”
